Wills and Probate records

The main types of probate records are wills, letters of administration and inventories. A will is a legal document in which a person records their last wishes before they die and describes the rights of others over their property after their death. If a person dies without making a will he is described as 'intestate'; in this case the court can grant 'letters of administration' which appoints administrators to administer the estate of the intestate. Letters of administration are sometimes referred to as 'admons'. Up to 1782 it was obligatory for every executor or administrator to return into the registry of the court an inventory of the deceased's goods, although these have not always survived.

Why we have wills

Before 1858 proving of wills came within the jurisdiction of courts that were administered by the church. The Prerogative Court of Canterbury (PCC) had over-riding jurisdiction in England and Wales during this time and also had sole jurisdiction over those with property in more than one diocese in the Southern Province, which included Worcestershire. The Prerogative Court of York (PCY) had jurisdiction over the Northern Province. PCC wills are held by The National Archives and PCY wills are held by the Borthwick Institute in York.

Each diocese had a consistory court, and copies of these records can usually be found at County Record Offices. Our collection of wills is for the Diocese of Worcester. This means that it may be possible to find wills in our collection from parishes in other counties that may have been in the Diocese of Worcester.

There are, however, some exceptions as to how and where wills were proved. These include:

- During the interregnum (1653-1660) all wills were proved in London
- Some parishes were allowed to prove their own wills. These parishes were known as 'Peculiars'.

In 1858 a Principal Probate Registry and 40 District Probate Registries for England and Wales were established. You are able to view the copied versions of these wills up until 1928.

Using the Handlist

1. If you are searching for a will proved at Worcester then most wills between 1451 and 1928 can be viewed on microfilm. If you are looking for the will of a particular person, you will first need to use our wills name index available on shelves in the self-service area to establish whether there might be a will. Remember also that any date given will be a date of probate, not a date of death.
2. This handlist is indexed by type of will and date. Find the section containing the type of will and the date you require and this will tell you what number microfilm you need to view.
3. Select the film you require. The films are arranged in numerical order. Take out the film, leaving your marker in its place.

Information wills can provide:

- Names and relationship of family members
- Details of occupation
- Names and description of the contents of a property
- Value of belongings
- Description of the size of the property

Limitations of wills include:

- Some wills have not survived, are badly damaged or illegible
- The majority of people did not make a will
- Before the Married Women's Property Act (1883) very few women made wills.
- Some wills were never proved
- Some records give little information

Other Sources:

- General Index to original records
- National Probate Calendar 1858-1943.
- Wills proved in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury 1686 - 1693.
Index collated by Anthony Camp, available in three volumes.

- Greenbank wills 1631-1800. An artificial collection created by Mr Greenbank, the Diocesan Registrar. These are not to be found in the main indexes. Instead an index is available on our website.
- Peculiars. Certain parishes were exempt from the jurisdiction of the bishop and archdeacon of the Diocese in which they were situated. They were subject instead of others such as lord of the manor or Dean and chapter of the Cathedral. Most were abolished in 1840. An index is available on our website.
